The spatial dynamics of the movements of individuals effect the spread of a disease. We expand an SI model with self- and cross-diffusion where the cross-diffusion effect of infective individuals on susceptible individuals are dependent on density. We examine the conditions under which patterns of susceptible and infective populations are formed.